* Photoshop Elements is essentially the same software, but runs under Microsoft Windows. # 6.3 Editing with layers ## Learning Objectives By the end of this chapter, you will be able to: * Create and manage layers in Photoshop * Understand the differences between raster and vector images * Consider how using layers is important to a successful digital imaging workflow This chapter starts by explaining the basics of Photoshop's layer concept. It then turns to the different ways in which you can layer edits, and the pros and cons of each method. ## Understanding Layers Understanding layers is critical to the success of your digital photography projects. Even with a basic understanding, you can apply layer techniques to all aspects of your workflow. Whether you view your images in the Adobe CS6, Elements, or other version of Photoshop, layers are available at a press of a button. You can use layers to build and organize your image projects from rough concepts to finished images. Figure 6-1 shows two layers stacked on top of each other in the Layers palette. Layers in a Photoshop file are nested, meaning that they can be created in any group and be used to add visual elements in whatever order you need. There are two types of layers in Photoshop: one is raster based; the other is vector based. Vector layers look like 3D objects and can be scaled up infinitely. This allows you to layer, or group, different elements such as shapes and logos. Raster layers, on the other hand, are made up of geometric shapes called pixels. However, you can only scale the size of raster layers to a very limited extent. Figure 6-1. Whether layers are raster or vector based, they can contain either vector or raster objects. Layered PSD files are organized differently from regular image files. There is a lower level of organization, and layers are all grouped together in the Layers palette. The basic concept of Photoshop file organization is to create a Structure for each project, along with specific Layers for each project (see the box on the next page for more on structures and layers).

Now, Las Vegas police will have to go through the same process to get a warrant, a task that can take weeks or months. The ordinance passed by the City Council replaces an ordinance written in 1892 for the state's first capital. Only one structure in the entire district — the state Capitol building — remained, since nearly everyone else was gone. The new law allows the police to request a warrant to search any building. Overnight visitors to nearby downtown hotels are likely to have their bags searched. And visitors to smaller or less well-known businesses can expect to see police collecting business records and asking questions. "When you're leaving your downtown hotel, the next place you're going is going to be inspected," said Merv Griffin, a Las Vegas City Council member who supported the bill. The city has not had a police search warrant since 2007, but they are used widely across the county. Most often, they are used to get into places where judges aren't easily available, like a house in the middle of nowhere or a commercial marijuana grow facility. The media often decries conservatives as extremists for being against the federal government intruding into our privacy. But the so-called liberals are no different, with their affinity for government intrusion into their own lives. They find disdain for conservatives because we want to protect our right to privacy, and yet they ignore the intrusions that they demand. These intrusions are not directed at the federal government, but against the individual citizen. This is where the true extremism lies. There are countless examples of this, ranging from the government mandating that you must purchase a certain amount of health insurance, to the government telling you what labwork you are required to do, to the government demanding that you submit to drug testing, to the government requiring that you obtain birth control for no medically relevant reason, to the government demanding that you wear a seat belt, to the government demanding that you obtain car insurance, to the federal government mandating that you have a home visit by government agents that you never asked for, to the federal government demanding that you open your social media accounts and read all of the private communications, to the federal government mandating that you live in a certain manner, to the federal government mandating that you buy food, to the federal government mandating that you eat certain foods, to the federal government demanding that you obtain a license to fish, to the federal government requiring that you submit to
