So my first cookbook collection is complete, I'm so excited to share how the challenge panned out with you! This book is only 500 pages because I consider myself a fast reader but I like to break up my reading with other activities: a quick snack before bed time reading, some light reading to calm my nerves during long waits, reading something while I'm lying down, like a Pinterest-driven Baby Steps: Life As We Knew It's a random book off of the shelf but it's been a good insulator in terms of the midweek lulls between courses. It was something so easy and quick it gave me a little reprieve from the craziness of the kitchen. My son looks up to me and I like to think this book is some inspiration for him to take a few tips to school and maybe have a bit more patience than he does at home: things like being responsible for his own plate, rewarding himself for his own hard work, cooking his own lunches and after school snacks. (Not just the Mondays when all I can think about is school, but really on a consistent basis, from 4 until YUUGE is done.) The cookbook itself is pretty simple, but I don't think that means it's not useful. I encourage all of you to keep these in mind when looking through the pages, it just makes for a better reading experience. Just like in my pre-real job life, I meant to just finish this challenge and get on with the job but it took forever and when I finally saw the light at the end of the tunnel, it was 10am! I had a good week with a few productivity improvements. However, I did still manage to add some new practice elements to my meals: This is the pasta sauté with mozzarella and pesto and onions. A very yummy and light lunch. I also made sure that I avoided making it cheesy, I did that with the cheese pizza that I added in my last comment. I did use a little more cheese than the recipe required, I ran out of yogurt on Tuesday. The lunch box starts with hummus and frozen brown rice. I used milk in the sauce so my kids got a dairy-based version. The texture was firm, just as I like. Onto the dinner. Since I had chili on Friday, I was looking to go back to it and it had
