the post-peak drop in impact force for all the specimens in the late stage of impact is due to the fiber debonding. the specimens g and gc1 showed the same post-peak drop in impact force, which is due to the failure of the glass fiber layer. specimen g showed a post-peak drop in impact force of almost half of the peak impact force, whereas specimen gc1 showed the same drop in impact force as that of specimen g. in this experimental study, the impact response of unidirectional hybrid composite laminate was investigated. hybrid laminates with different stacking sequences were fabricated, using unidirectional glass and carbon fiber as reinforcement and epoxy resin as matrix. astm standard d5628 was followed to conduct the experiment using the instrumented drop weight impact test apparatus. all the square specimens were tested at an impact velocity of 3.43 m/s and the time histories of force and energy absorbed were recorded. the impacted specimens and their x-ray images were visually inspected to understand the failure pattern. the experimental results showed that the addition of carbon fiber increases the impact strength by absorbing more force and energy. furthermore, the laminate can be stiffened with the carbon fiber layers by interfacing glass fiber layers on either side. the unidirectional hybrid composite laminates were fabricated by using unidirectional glass and carbon fiber as reinforcement and epoxy resin as matrix. the impact response of the composite laminates was investigated by using the instrumented drop weight impact test apparatus. the impact behavior of unidirectional hybrid composite laminates was studied to understand the effect of the carbon fiber on the impact behavior of the hybrid laminates. the experimental results showed that the addition of carbon fiber increases the impact strength by absorbing more force and energy. moreover, the laminate can be stiffened with the carbon fiber layers by interfacing glass fiber layers on either side.
