relates to the field of semiconductor integrated circuit devices, and more particularly to an interface circuit for receiving a plurality of address/command signals and generating a plurality of control signals. 2. Description of the Related Art In a semiconductor memory device, such as a synchronous dynamic random access memory (SDRAM), an address/command signal input terminal is provided on one of the SDRAM's I/O pins. In order to maximize the capacity of the SDRAM, the address/command signal input terminal on the I/O pins are disposed on an area of the SDRAM chip that is close to the memory cell array, in order to minimize the length of address/command lines from the address/command signal input terminals to the memory cell array. As a result, the address/command signal line is shorter than a comparable standard device, and thus has a greater capacitance. In addition, the address/command signal line has a relatively high impedance (e.g., an impedance in the range of a few hundreds of kilo-ohms (Kohms)). For this reason, a conventional address/command signal input circuit must have low input impedance, for example, on the order of 100 Megohms. FIG. 1A is a block diagram of a conventional S
